

ABSTRACT

A method and apparatus for reducing interpath interference between a first signal and at least one other signal is provided. The invention provides for obtaining a relative phase of the first signal and the at least one other signal, determining an interference component on the first signal caused by the at least one other signal, and removing the interference component from the first signal. The invention is particularly adapted for non-coherent mean-value calculations in a RAKE receiver.

5

10017745, 121491